Problem

As one of the largest employers of C++ programmers in Hungary, fast growing NNG has been facing an uphill battle in the recruitment fields.

The company utilizes most of the traditional HR tools

- advertising on job portals, jobfairs and headhunter companies, just like most of its competitors.

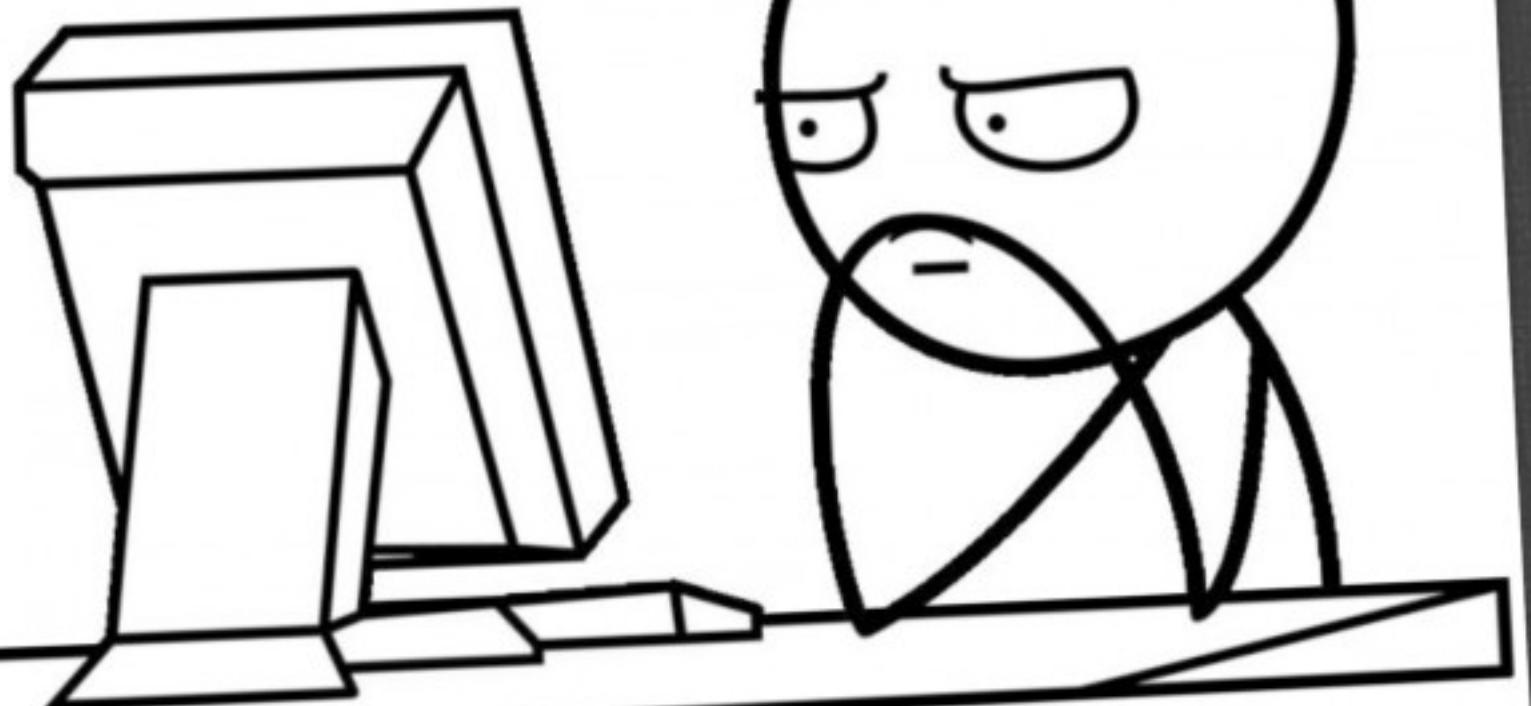

> Go Beyond <

It was time to go beyond the average tools and to reach out to those developers who are not actively seeking for a job change.

INSIGHT

We took a closer look at the attributes of a great developer: they have a passion for programming, their jobs
are also their hobby,
and they love challenges.

Solution

We teamed up with a young and enthusiastic online agency Kriek, and created an unbranded C++ online game for programmers, with dozens of C++ puzzles developed inhouse. For players it's not related to NNG. Initially.

How It Works?

The initial levels serve as the hook to catch the programmers' interest to accomplish all the programming tasks. While playing they can share the results on Facebook - and spread it among our target group.

The Twist

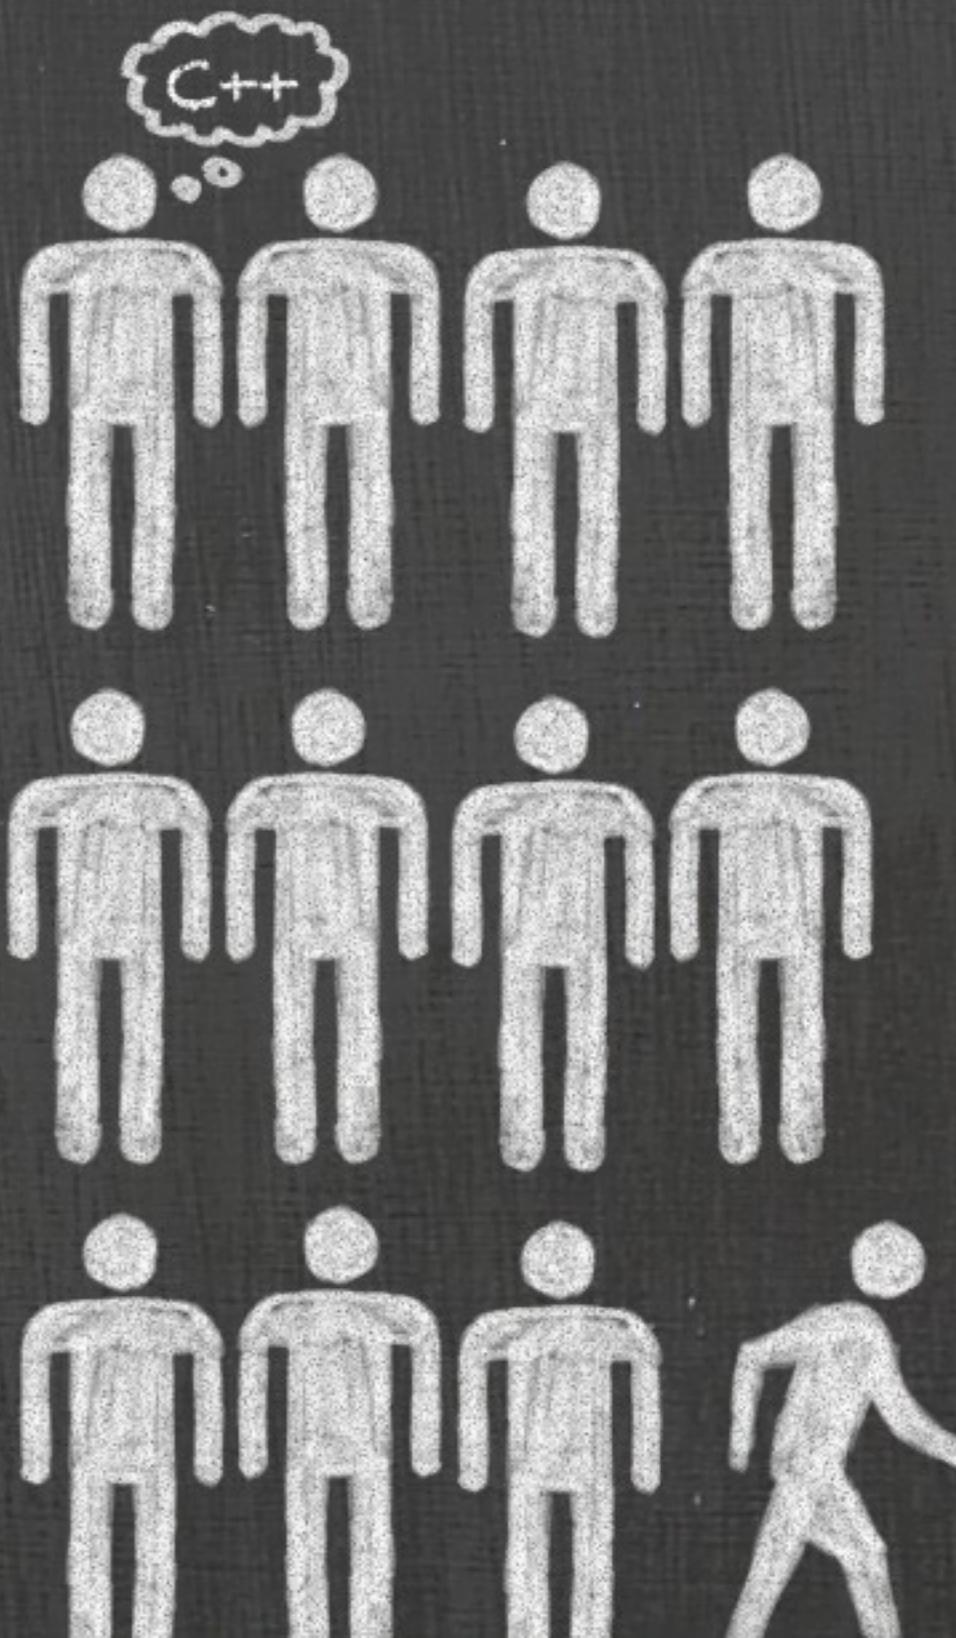

Once they have mastered level three the game only allows them to enter the bonus level if they contact NNG's HR for the bonus code - discovering at the same time who is behind the game. In fact, the programmers learn that they have already passed the first round of job interviews.

Results

Since the beginning of the game, nearly 600 C++ programmers have taken the challenge, which represents approximately 10% of the available C++ population.

10%

Although the game is time consuming and challenging, 12 players are already at level 3.
